A collection of brief, true tales By Midwest Book Review Spending Grandma's Inheritance: A Probate Lawyer's Journey Through Estate Planning and Probate is a collection of brief, true tales from Attorney J. Mark Fisher's twenty years of experience as a specialist in estate planning and probate. Told with dry humor, these stories present every outrageous thing he has heard in his profession from "We've ruined the kids but maybe there's hope for the grandkids" to "My son's widow has all my money" to "I've had six husbands and I'm still looking for a good one." Part cautionary anthology, part laugh-out-loud funny insight into the depths of human greed and wrangling, part legal analysis, part seasoned professional's opinion, Spending Grandma's Inheritance is pure fun to read and simultaneously a very informative introduction to some of the most complicated hassles and problems involved in estate planning. A sample tip from the text: "In my opinion, a child under the age of 25 should never receive a large lump sum of money. They do not appreciate the money and do not have the discipline to keep it. Most will squander it in the first few years and never have it as security for retirement."

Attorney J. Mark Fisher has counseled thousands of people over his twenty-year practice. As a specialist in estate planning and probate, he's heard it all. The stories presented here in Spending Grandma's Inheritance represent some of the most outrageous, humorous, and unique experiences a probate attorney can have: I got my inheritance and yours too! Mom liked me best We've ruined the kids but maybe there is hope for the grandkids My son's widow has all my money I've had six husbands and I'm still looking for a good one And many more Spending Grandma's Inheritance will give you an insight into the wild world of estate planning, and keep you laughing-all the way to your attorney's office.
