Reconnaissance of Anglo-Irish Child-Related Divorce Legislation:

This book is a unique comparative study examining the way English and Irish law addresses the needs of children whose parents separate and divorce. How far do the two countries' family justice systems listen to and take account of children's wishes and feelings when parents separate? What are the ways and means of meeting children's needs for reliable information and support in these circumstances? Exploring these questions, the book reports and contrasts the views of practitioners from both countries with what is known of children's own experiences. The study considers the problems that lawyers have when thinking about and dealing with children, and it raises practice and policy questions.
