About the Author Paul Samakow Esq. began his practice of law in 1980 and has rejoiced every day since, because every day he gets to help somebody. He passed the Bar exam and went into practice for himself, and took on cases in many areas of law, including criminal, family law, bankruptcy, small business representation, real estate settlements, and more. After about five years, he slowly started focusing his practice in the area of personal injury law because with this focus he felt the most accomplishment for his clients. Since the late-80s, he has focused on personal injury work. In his words: "All I do is represent people who have been injured, and the families of those who have lost a loved one. I've seen the devastation that an injury can bring to people, physically, emotionally, and financially. I've also seen what insurance companies do, and I detest that they act as if people are plastic or metal. They think that throwing a little bit of money should make things okay. Money cannot erase an injury or bring back a lost loved one. I thrive on making things as right as they can be (and as expensive as they can be for the insurance companies)." Except for his law school years, Paul has lived in the Washington, D.C. area his entire life. He is married and has four daughters.
